Cautious optimism after COVID declines

The severity of COVID-19 is waning nationwide, but life may not return to normal for a long while. Good hygiene and social distancing have flattened South Korea's curve, and if the current level of manageable stability continues, the nation will begin "social distancing in daily life" on May 6. This means that low-risk public facilities may resume operations as soon as they are ready.

Health experts are anticipating a second wave in the fall or winter, and the government says it will increase social distancing policies again at any time, should a major risk factor be discovered.

If you're feeling ready to venture outside, grab a mask and head to Gupo Mujangaesup-gil (trail), an all-accessible boardwalk path.
